Ty Cobb Picks Sox to Land

Ty Cobb, for years the champion batsman of the major leagues, thinks the Chicago White Sox will win the 1920 pennant and battle once more for the world's title against the National League victor. Cobb admits that Tris Speaker's Cleveland Indians are giving the present title-holders a warm argument, but the Georgian believes that greater all-around efficiency, in the field, at bat, and on the rubber, will eventually bring the White Sox to the top of the heap to stay.

Kid Gleason, while in Washington, was willing to admit, though in a rather sotto voce manner, that his team would be the pennant winners. He, too, based his ideas on the generally smoother workmanship of his outfit as compared with Speaker's Indians. He also had quite a bit to say regarding the two pitching staffs, boosting his own without blushing the least bit. The return of Urban Faber seems to have added to Gleason's happiness considerably, for now he has four capable, experienced pitchers to take their turn on the hill. And, as most folks know, four real pitchers is plenty enough to swing a real ball club into a championship.
